

Anahí and the Ceibo Flower

On the banks of the Paraná, in eastern Argentina, lived a young Guaraní who sang in a special way. Upon the arrival of the "conquerors", Anahí was arrested along with other people from the town. She one night she ran away from her, but they quickly discovered her. Her sentence was her death, her tied a tree to be burned.

The day the sentence was served, and while her body burned, Anahí began to sing. The next morning, in the place where her body was consumed, several red flowers appeared, which are now the Argentine National and are called "Flor de Ceibo".

