There was a boy who had a very bad character. One day, his father gave him a bag of nails and told him that whenever he lost his cool, he would hammer a nail into the backyard fence. On the first day, the boy drove 37 nails. The next day, less, and so on the rest of the days. The little boy was realizing that it was easier to control his temper and his bad temper than to drive the nails into the fence. Finally the day came when the boy did not lose his temper even once and was happy to tell his father about it. He had finally managed to control his bad temper! His father, very happy and satisfied, then suggested that for each day that he controlled his character, he would take a nail out of the fence. The days passed and when the boy finished removing all the nails he went to tell his father. Then the father took his son by the hand to the fence and said: "You have worked hard to nail and remove the nails from this fence, but look at all the holes that were left. It will never be the same. What I mean is that when you say or do things with a bad temper, anger and bad temper you leave a scar, like these holes in the fence. It doesn't matter if you apologize. The wound will always be there. And a physical injury is the same as a verbal injury. Friends, as well as parents and the whole family, are true jewels who must be valued. They smile and encourage you to improve. They listen to you, share a word of encouragement and always have their hearts open to receive you." The words of his father, as well as the experience with the nails, made the boy reflect on the consequences of his character. And Colorado, this story is over.
