

The President's Letter: My Declared Enemies

My dear citizens,

Today I address you, not with a promise of prosperity, but with a declaration of war. Not against a country, not against a foreign army, but against our internal enemies.

These enemies are not people with faces or names, but the actions that harm us all. My government and I have decided to declare a total and absolute enmity against thieves, who steal our possessions and our peace of mind; against liars, who corrupt trust with their empty words; and against murderers, who take away people's most valuable possession: their life.

Being enemies of these actions is not an option; it's our duty. Because, at the end of the day, a healthy society isn't built with friends, but with the absence of enemies.

Sincerely,

The President of the Nation
